A FARMER'S TALK TO FARMERS

Minnesota as a Leader in Agriculture—How Farming is Taught at the University-rlow Cooperation is Demonstrated-Cooperation the Brightest Star in the Agricultural Sky.

(Written Specially for The Bulletin.)

Minnesota, of all the states in the union, seems to be a little the most advanced in the matter of rural cooperation. This is largely due to the "down-to-the-bottom" work of a lot of practical professors at the University of Minnesota. These gentlemen appear to have demonstrated that theory and practice can be made to go together, to the mutual advantage of both, and that a college professor need not, necessarily, be an impractical dreamer. Some of us "old farmere" may perhaps get an idea from the way they are—not telling how to do things, but actually doing them. 'Most any of us can tell how things ought to be done, but not all of us practice it. 'Most any of us can rell how things ought to be done, but not all of us can do 'em. Out in Minnesota they seem to be preaching and practicing both, and the practicing part is peculiarly interesting. (Written Specially for The Bulletin.) | ket at about the highest price which

The state university has, among other branches, a college of agriculture for advanced students, and a school of agriculture for instruction in the retirement school of agriculture for instruction in the primary work of the farm. Naturally the student's in the advanced college course are less numerous than those in the school, which this year includes some cight hundred boys and girls. They come to this school quite young, meeting only very easy requirements for admission. In the school they are taught farming-farming as it can be done. They are taught a little chemistry and a little botany and a little natural history of course, because no man can possibly be a good farmer unless he knows something along these lines. Now you'r strength shying stones at his windows.

Fire insurance is another of the cooperative schemes carried on under this same general university management. All that need be said of it is that experience has shown the cost to be from a half to two-thirds less than usual premiums. Rural telephones are also installed in the same co-operative way. The criginal cost varies according to the distance over which poles and wires must be erected, but the average is about $40. This having been paid once for all, the following cost is never over and often under $60 per annum. So great has been the development of this telephone feature that the larger, 110ft-seeking companies, which are not printed in black. of a book on chemistry or botany. It's true, fust the same. Real knowledge of farm chemistry and botany doesn't come whelly from books. It comes also from the lessons of Teacher Nature, which are not printed in black ink with metal type, but are buried in the cirt and locked in the rocks and dissiplyed in the brooks and painted on the green meadows and biggoned forth expense. the firt and locked in the rocks and dissolved in the brooks and painted on the green meadows and blazoned forth in riolous orgies of color in the leaves and the flowers and the kaleidoscopic pastosama of changing autumn. "Old Nan Binks" may never have seen a school textbook on botany and may never have heard the Latin name for quack grass. But he knows it, never-theless—he knows the actual facts about it better than half the professional botanists. He might vigorously deny that he knows anything about botany. "But I kin raise clover and I kin kill quack grass," he'll admit. And yet he's "no botanist!" I tell you he's one of the best in his neighborhood. Only it has cost him a long life of close observation and a great many mistakes and some waste of labor and some loss of profits to gain the wisdom which a primary course in the elements of botany might have taught him more cheaply and quicker.

The complex to gain the wisdom which a primary course in the elements of botany might have taught him more cheaply and quicker.

To come back to the Minnesota school of agriculture; it helps the youngsters to get a start before they begin actual work on their own farms; gives them some real advantage over those who have to learn while working and make mistakes in order to find out how not to make them. While it has often been urged as an argument against an agricultural college that most of its graduates go into something besides farming, the record of this Minnesota school is that eighty in every hundred of its students go back to the farms and generally become, in a very few years, the admitted leaders in their neighborhoods in farm success. The boys are taught how to run farms by being put right into the harnes on one which is run, not solely for practice, but also for profit. They see how things are done and they do them. Thus they get such a grounding in the elements of farm management as could come to them. Thus they get such and bitter seasons of disappointment. The girls are taught, as well, how to make a farmhouse a "home"—which, alass! some farmhouses are not. They see how things are done and they do them. Thus they get such the grade of such help and training, only through long years of experiment and bitter seasons of disappointment. The girls are taught, as well, how to make a farmhouse a renot. They also what to cook and bake and how to cook and bake most economically and most wholesomely. But it is in the work of farm co-operation, conducted under the aus-pices of the university, in connection with the school and the college of ag-riculture, that the most important de-velopment of the university's idea has been accomplished All up-to-date velopment of the university's idea has been accomplished. All up-to-date dairymen know of the general idea of the Minnesota co-operative dairies. The ground plan is very simple; it provides for the assembling of farmers having from 500 to 2,000 cows, in the aggregate, into creamery districts. The milk is brought to the creameries, tested for butter fat, and the farmer is promptly paid the market price, based on that test. All the milk is used for butter. It is sold in open mar-that only the very best, and, therefore, the highest priced skill should be em-ployed in making butter, and the patrons, have now-come, universally, to see that this is true economy in the end. Once in so often a regular "round-up" of the business is made and the patrons then get, in addition to the pay for their milk, their pro-rata share of the net profits made from selling the fanciest possible butter at the fanciest prices.

That is, the Minnesots co-operative dairyman gets for his butter all it is worth, after the expenses of making and selling are deducted, and none of it is paid as toll to Mr. Middleman. And, if you will pardon the interjection of a personal reflection, it certainly is more comfortable and sensible. If you don't like Mr. Middleman, to just build a road gound his toll-gate this way and leave him out, than it is to spend your breath denouncing him or your strength shying stones at his windows.
